SOCIAL MOVEMENTS AND SOCIAL PROCESSES—CAPE TOWN AND THE ANTI-APARtheid MOVEMENT

Instructor: Ivan Evans (Sociology)
Office hours/venue: TBA
Lecture hall/times: TBA

Introduction
Cape Town played a distinct role in the anti-Apartheid movement in South Africa. Largely because of the curious racial demography that Apartheid policies forced on it, the city developed a large African population only from the 1970s onwards, long after the emergence of a mixed-race community of “coloureds” that viewed the city’s metropolitan region as its geographical and cultural “home”. Intra-black relations between Africans and coloureds throughout the 20th century were therefore shaped by a complex cluster of racial, ethnic, class and gender factors that simultaneously drew the groups together but also kept them at arm’s length. Ethnic tension was therefore as germane to the relations between the two groups as the broad unity they forged to confront the Apartheid state. Evidence of these ambivalent relations is everywhere present in the city even today, almost two decades after Apartheid ended in 1994—in some respects, divisions between the two communities may be said to be as firm, if not firmer, today than they were in 1994. This course examines the city as a living embodiment and repository of the many contradictions of Apartheid by mainly focusing on the social movements that emerged in the course of the Apartheid era (1948-1994).

Cape Town’s anti-Apartheid social movements reflected the mélange of vibrant and often blurred ethnic identities that collectively comprised the broad category referred to as “Blacks”: “Cape Malays”, “Coloureds”, “Indians”, “Christians”, “Muslims” and Africans who were mainly Xhosa. Lectures by expert South African academics and community leaders and frequent walking tours of the city will explore both the sense of community that “Blacks” shared as well as the deep ethnic fissures that still divide the city’s inhabitants.
